Coming upon the clearing in the woods, you can see the house hugging the contours of the rocky hill, looking comfortably settled in, as though it had been there for some time, becoming a part of the natural landscape. With a new house, it's not easy to achieve that organic, earthy quality without looking artificially "rustic". Asheville architect Michael McDonough does just that with a mountaintop Fairview home that takes the best elements of natural building and applies them to thoughtful design, creating a home that's grounded but refined.

The house makes spectacular use of wood, much of it locally-sourced. Towering locust-trunk pillars frame the outside arrival area as wide-plank steps lead to a custom white oak, black walnut, and maple door. The floor in the entryway—made from trees sustainably culled and mule-hauled from the forest of nearby Warren Wilson College—features black walnut. There are cherry cabinets in the kitchen and split cedar shakes on the exterior. Each...
